I revered my elegant and effervescent grandmother. When she was diagnosed with Parkinson's disease, I watched as it wrecked her body and mind at an excruciating crawl. As the consummate hostess and gracious spirit gave way to a frail and tired soul, I learned the power of photography as evidence and preservation.

I soon learned that I am driven by the transcendent power of narrative and the challenge to achieve intimacy that touches the full arc of the human condition.

As a journalism student, I was captivated by the power of the image to document and drive empathy, and in my nearly seven years at the New York Times, I continued to seek stories at the intersection of health, family and personal identity.

I spent nearly a decade immersed in New York City, a place where I learned to appreciate the vibrant and effervescent change of scenery and the steady stream of personality I encountered. I now live in San Francisco with my husband and our mutt Duma, and have the grand opportunity to experience a far different scope of beauty in the natural world that surrounds us.

My time in the south, and on the road, has instilled a love for the little things you might see along the way.

Moxie is, of course, my mother - my fiercest supporter, best critic, and guide in all things.
